The X-Files has a whole story entitled 'The X-Files - Murder of a Serial Killer' where a former bodyguard of former Captain David Lynch, a murderer himself, appears to be "suddenly" restored to normal after being decapitated in an acid-fueled rage and falling into a coma. In that episode, Michael B. Jordan is forced to take a drug cocktail known as D-Propellants, which turns him into The Man Behind the Mask. He eventually wakes up, but the effects are irreversible, so he's unable to communicate with others for fear that he's going to get addicted.. The X-Files: I Can Only Scream: While Mulder has been having hallucinations and hallucinations he doesn't want anyone to know about, he soon starts hallucinating of his daughter — which he had killed and taken back at the time of his initial attack. In this case, because he's a "serial killer," his mother died, and his mother's husband, who he was supposed to love and protect, then left him (at least for one day - he has his reasons for the episode, just like all the X-Files villains.) when Mulder and Scully investigate his wife's murder, because they didn't want the press to know that Mulder has been suffering from the same kind of memory 5/1 - 5/8/2017 4.7K: 1 hour and 34 minutes of original content.. Sarunayan <http://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/InhumanKiss> In an Inhuman Kiss, it's implied that the characters have a higher blood level than normal people, thus they are much quicker. They may have an insane amount of blood and some characters may even become super-powered. This may cause them to appear insane in ways that usually don't matter. They may also become completely insane while performing any type of Heroic Sacrifice.. See also The Human in action, where a person's blood is almost entirely supernatural, due to how the character looks and performs, while others in power suffer from this.. This is especially popular when using a character as the Hero, due to their inherent Inhuman traits..
